Excerpt: . jacobus henricus van T hoff ou have two substances: they both have the same atoms, the same number of atoms, in the same proportion by weight. So far as you can make out, they both have the same structural formula. Yet they show decided differences in properties. They have different crystalline structures and different optical properties, for example. What are we to make of this? Such was Pasteur s problem with his famous tartaric acids. Such was Wislicenus s difficulty with his lactic acids. Structural formulas, as written on paper--in two dimensions therefore--failed utterly to show any differences in these compounds. Now, of course, it did not require any very keen insight on the part of Pasteur, Wislicenus, and others, to realise that real molecules occupy not two but three dimensions, and that at best, paper formulas were a useful, but not a...
