Stephen, having a leaden flavour, perhaps only perceptible to the conscience-stricken, as it is not detected by strangers. Doveb. --The Dour Eiver is a very trifling stream, about five miles long; it turns several paper mills, and small trout are met with in parts of its waters. As if is not our intention altogether in this work to teach the reader how to take fish in salt water, or to make his tackle for that purpose, he must be satisfied, therefore, if we refer him to a work entitled The Sea Fisherman, by Mr. J. C. Wilcocks (Longman, Green, and Co. , 1868), who, having resided on the coast the greater part of his life, at different localities, and made seafishing a study in both theory and practice, may be thoroughly relied on in all that relates to the details of this branch of our art. If the deep-sea fisher prefers his own tackle, he will therein learn how to make it up, and preserve it, or where to get it. The men at the various coast resorts, generally provide this sort of thing for the occasion; and if it be needed for pier, coast, or rock fishing, the nearest tackle shop or barbers mostly have some rude gear for sale. The nature of the fish that are caught at the places mentioned in this work is another matter, and one upon which every angler ought to know something before he goes afloat and submits...
