This unfounded charge and gratuitous assault, met with a severe rebuke at the hands of General Cass. In his letter, dated Paris, . 6th of March, 1837, after fully vindicating his conduct, he concludes: with these reflections and statements, I leave the charge of General Clinch to the judgment of the American people. If they think that the incapacity, or misfortunes, or dissensions of military commanders are to be visited upon my head, I have only to submit with as much resignation as may be. But I hope better things from the impartiality of my countrymen. I have received, during a public life of more than thirty years, many favors I neither expected nor merited. I am encouraged to hope that when I ask only rigid justice, I shall not be found a vain suppliant. CHAPTER V. General Cass possesses stores of knowledge beyond mere politics. This is attested by various productions from his pen. It would be but common place to say, that the mind imbued with letters has a better groundwork for statesmanship, than the one whose only food is current politics. Where it is eminently practical, also, as with General Cass, we have materials for statesmanship of the first order. It was a flue remark of Baron Humboldts, when in the United States, (the great traveller and author, of whose renown in Prussia the lamented Wheaten, our late Minister to that country, has informed us,) who, alter...
