Certainty is demanded in pleadings, also freedom from analysis, construction, argument and hypothesis. The foregoing well illustrates the difficulty of applying tests of an adjudication, even in states that respect the mandatory record. Sec. 74. A rule of evidence is chiefly involved We have mentioned the best evidence, and that what ought to be of record must be proved by record and by the right record. It is well to remember that in a general sense pleadings are but evidence; from caption to verification they are the best evidence of all that relates to the controversy. It may be truly said of them that what should appear from the pleadings must so appear, and also that what is shown by them is conclusive. Exp-ressio unius est exelusio alterius. Besides this, it is well to impress that the purpose and destiny of pleadings are for the support of the high policies. The view that evidence is inconsequential in procedure is a mistaken one. , The purpose and end of the record is to constitute a memorial of what was done, and this is equally true in all governmental operations. Just what the record should show cannot be specified in advance, for it depends on the subject-matter, its nature, and the rights that arise out of and attach to it, e. g. , whether it is criminal, civil or equitable. VVhat is proper procedure depends on the nature of the subject-matter. This...
