They spoke in whispers; they were very fearful; it was still twilight. It were a righteous act to thrust her in a grave, they murmured to one another at the last, --and paused. Ay, truly, they agreed. Otherwise she may break the bonds of the tomb, and rise again, and haunt us always: who can say But the gold And then they paused again. It were a sin, one murmured, -- it were a sin to bury the pure good gold in darkness. Even if it came from bell The priests will bless it for us, answered the other twain. Against the reddening skies the lark was singing. The three reapers waited a little, still afraid, then hastily, as men slaughter a thing they dread may rise against them, they stripped the white robes from her and drew off the anklets of gold from her feet, and the chains of gold that were riven about her breast and limbs. When they had stripped her body bare, they were stricken with a terror of the dead whom they thus violated with their theft; and, being consumed with apprehension lest any, as the day grew lighter, should pass by there and see what they had done, they went out in trembling haste, and together dug deep down into the wet sands, where the reeds grew, and dragged her still warm body unshrouded to the air, and thrust it down there into its nameless grave, and covered...
