It was brought to mind in connection with something foreign to asphalt, and that is india rubber. The chemist of a Montreal rubber shoe firm found that in making rubber cement one day a quantity of the cement wouldn t stick to rubber at all, and he looked into the matter, but couldn t find out anything about it. He stuck at it, however, I think, for three months or more, and finally he did find what seemed to satisfy him, and he reported this. By a microscopical examination of the rubber used in making the cement, he found that it had changed its condition, and become crystalline from age; in that change it had lost its adhesive properties. That would seem to apply also to glass--that where glass has been exposed to the weather it can become devitrified on the surface and become slightly crystallized. I should like to ask those who have studied the question whether this brown powder, which they say on heating goes back to the black form, is changed if only subjected to 100 temperature, and whether that change has been studied microscopically, or whether the microscope reveals anything in the character of that brown coating which would give any indication in any direction. Mr. Whipple. ijj. Whipple.--Iwould say, in answer to that question, that the change from brown to black took place at 100 C, and that we examined that substance with the microscope, and...
